NOW HERE, A GUILD HALL: OFFSITE EXHIBITION
BY ALICE HOPE, BASTIENNE SCHMIDT, AND TONI ROSS
OPEN NOW THROUGH SEPTEMBER 30
AT THE AMAGANSETT U.S. LIFE-SAVING STATION

July 26, 2022—East Hampton, NY — On Sunday, July 17, Guild Hall (158 Main Street, East Hampton) celebrated the opening of the first of two exhibitions as part of GUILD HALL: OFFSITE. The exhibition, NOW HERE, created by The No W here Collective, made up of artists Alice Hope, Toni Ross, and Bastienne Schmidt, and curated by Christina Mossaides Strassfield, is on view at the Amagansett U.S. Life-Saving Station (160 Atlantic Avenue, Amagansett) now through September 30, 2022. Click HERE for a selection of press-approved images.

This unique project primarily responds to the Life-Saving Station’s “faking box”, seen as the emblematic artifact in the station’s collection that reflects their mission — to save lives. The faking box shares a formal aesthetic with the Collective’s founding inspiration, the Metropolitan Museum’s Marshallese Navigation Chart. The artists are exhibiting works in the south-facing crew quarters on the second floor, the western-facing backyard, and the southeast corner of the wrap-around porch, as well as other areas on the site. In the crew quarters, the artists have created responsive installations to the room and the faking box. The outdoor installations are also responsive to the site, the faking box, and include references to the Marshallese Navigation Chart.

Outdoor installations can be viewed at all times and works exhibited indoors can be seen from Friday to Sunday, 11AM-3PM, or by appointment. Exhibition-related programs include a “Meet the Artists” Talk and Walkabout on Sunday, July 31 at 6PM and a Panel Discussion with the Artists on Saturday, August 20 at 6PM.

Guild Hall’s Museum Director & Chief Curator Christina Mossaides Strassfield has been working closely with the No W here Collective and the Amagansett U.S. Life-Saving Station (ALSS) to make this project come together. Strassfield shared, “The idea focuses on life-saving and working together during the pandemic, creating a pod, and to a certain extent, saving one another through art, and having each other to support their creative energies. The concept of saving one another, sharing the inspiration of the ALSS, the guiding presence of the architecture of the building, and the ocean which surrounds us, is the core of the dialogue which has created the site-specific installations that the artists have crafted within and outside of the ALSS building. We are thrilled by the collaboration of these two organizations working to bring forward this exciting project.”

Of the faking box, exhibition essayist George Negrofonte writes:

“‘Fake’ is a nautical term meaning to coil or methodically arrange a rope ‘ready for running.’ The word provides no clue as to the larger purpose of a faking box: it was a life-saving device primarily used in the 19th and early 20th centuries for rescuing sailors stranded at sea. A faking box was made of wood with dowels that organized a rope in a zig-zag pattern, ready to be used in an emergency. When in need, the faking box was turned upside down, and the rope was neatly deposited from its frame onto the ground. The rope was attached to a Lyle gun, a line-throwing device that looked like a cannon that fired a shot line at the imperiled ship. Once secured, it created a rope bridge connecting land and ship. Additionally, pulleys and life-rings helped transport sailors to shore. The sole purpose of the faking box was to allow the shot line to be fired without becoming tangled or knotted. It is such a simple device you might think Temple Grandin invented it. It was a nitty-gritty and indispensable tool for rescue, but for our artists, it offers a lot of inspiration and meaning beyond practical use.”

No W here Collective Artist Statements:

Alice Hope: I’ve been using the box spring as a grid and armature for several years, while also welcoming the references implied in the found object; in the Station’s crew room, where the men slept, I’ve made a new cot box spring assemblage that responds to the faking box.

I’ve also included a site-specific piece made entirely with blue tape, a new material, which is inspired by currents—the essential life taking and giving ocean phenomenon. On the grounds, I’ve compiled an installation made with a new sculptural form—an enlarged dock cleat—connected to organized and piled rope, made with footage of used Coke can tabs.

I also have a site-specific assemblage made with red trammel netting and used Budweiser tabs referencing the immense ghost nets left at sea.

Bastienne Schmidt: Envisioning the exhibition Now Here created an exciting opportunity for our collective to feel inspired by the history of the Amagansett U.S. Life-Saving Station, but also some actual tools used for life saving. A particular object that spoke to all of us was the faking box, a rectangular wooden frame with Shaker-style dowels sticking out. A rope was inserted in a cross-grid-like formation, which was used to unravel at fast speed, and later placed upside down in the sand where it was catapulted with a cannon to reach people in distress at sea with great speed. This object is reminiscent of a grid, but the process of unraveling also comes to mind. Coming out of a particularly difficult time such as the pandemic reminds you of the yin and yang of seeing sea faring as a metaphor for life.

Toni Ross: Over the last few years, I have used my weaving practice as a life raft, a navigational tool to help me find my way through the uncharted waters of the COVID-19 pandemic. In our collective exhibition, Now Here, I expand on this idea by exploring the maritime history of life saving at The Amagansett U.S. Life-Saving Station Museum and highlight the beauty of the building itself.

Many of the works reveal my fascination with rhythms and patterns of language. Abstracted international maritime signal flags figure prominently in the work woven through jute netting and potato sacks. Another element of the work brings attention to overlooked details by incorporating found objects from the site of the Museum. An interactive piece echoes the Museum's architectural forms and provides the viewer a place to rest while contemplating the elegance and historical context of the Life-Saving Station.

ABOUT THE ARTISTS

ALICE HOPE

Alice Hope works with materials that have cultural references. She intends her materials to be both the object and the subject of her work, while she also aspires to transform the materials to a-materiality, into experience.

For the last seven years she has been immersed in using the used can tab about which she states "The used can tab can be looked at from a multiplicity of perspectives - that its proportion is in the Golden Mean like the Parthenon; that it's a tool - a lever; that it's trash; that it's an icon; that it's an anti-phallus with its equal negative and positive space; that as a floor plan it emulates Renaissance cathedrals with its apse and nave; its ergonomics; its timed obsolescence; its demographically democratic use—but in my work I focus on the used tab as a relic of consumption and as a token for redemption."

Hope has created numerous site-specific public and residential installations. Some highlights include Camp Hero State Park in Montauk, New York for the Parrish Art Museum, Pier 92 Lobby for the Armory Show, WNYC's Greene Space lobby, Queens Museum, US Embassy's lobby in Mozambique for Art in Embassies, the National Museum for Women in the Arts, and Guild Hall. She shows with Tripoli Gallery in Wainscott, New York and Ricco Maresca in NYC.

ABOUT THE AMAGANSETT U.S. LIFE-SAVING STATION

The Amagansett Station was constructed on Atlantic Avenue in 1902, one of a network of thirty life-saving stations on the South Shore of Long Island. Through each night and in bad weather the crew at these stations kept watch from the lookout tower and by patrolling the beach. Discovering a ship in distress, the life-savers would perform a rescue by launching their surfboat or by firing a line to the ship and taking people off with a breeches buoy. From 1902 to 1937 the crew of the Amagansett Life-Saving Station, most of whom were experienced local fishermen and shore whalers, kept watch over this beach and rescued sailors and passengers from a number of shipwrecks.

The Life-Saving Service and the Lighthouse Service were the two federal programs intended to increase the safety of coastal navigation. These two services were later joined in the U.S. Coast Guard. The Amagansett Life-Saving Station complements the Montauk Point Lighthouse in recalling that era of our maritime history when ships sailing the ocean provided the principal means of transporting goods and people in coastal America.
